Share. Luther Vandross was a beautiful young man in the 60s, later becoming a beautiful young man in the 70s and 80s, and eventually an older man in the 90s. He loved everyone and had a great sense of humor, as well as a gift for writing beautiful, graceful and soulful music. He was a man that most people wished they could have been. He was blessed with the gift of being able to do what he loved while he was alive, with no fear of failure. He lived in Manhattan, spent most of his money on his favorite things, drove a brand new sports car to his favorite gig, and had a one bedroom loft on top of the art studio on the top floor of his Gramercy Park pied-a-terre. He was kind, loving and generous to everyone he met and most importantly, he was proud of being a Puerto Rican and a black man. His music touched the souls of many people because he shared his story with us all. He lived his life with grace, dignity and pride. Many people told me not to do this post, and the reason they gave me was that it was too sad. I disagreed, however, because I felt it was important to share this story with everyone, because after all, we are the ones who still haven't heard the truth about his story, his love and his life. When Luther passed away, there were many tributes to him, but none had the heart of this one man. Now, the story is not sad, it is tragic. It is a story of the kind of life that could have been for this man. My own nephew loved Luther Vandross and asked me to please do this post because he wanted to. He is three and a half now, and he often watched Luther sing on The Best of Luther Vandross, Love Will Save the Day, and Amazing Grace. Luther on The Best of Luther Vandross I know the truth about Luther. I was sitting in the living room at my home in NYC on a hot June day when my nephew asked me why Luther was singing on the best of Luther Vandross. Luther, who I saw sing that day, was the same black man that I saw as a boy growing up. When we first arrived at his home, the woman who was there told us that Luther had just finished speaking to a few people and went back into his studio. My nephew asked 82157476af
